When and Why I Avoid Commutes

I live in Boston, which has some of the worst congestion* per mile in the United States. High prices and bad traffic make commuting one of my worst investments of time and money. Commuting also can make me feel unhappy. Given these costs, how do I decide when to commute?

I'm lucky that my job doesn't always require me to come to the office. When I'm not teaching classes or in meetings, I can work from anywhere like at home or a café. However, even when I don't have [33] mandatory meetings, commuting is still sometimes worth the cost.

I commute to the office to have brainstorming meetings. It's easier and more fun to have a creative conversation in person because we can take walking breaks and write our ideas on a whiteboard. Research supports the hypothesis that idea generation is best done in person.

I commute to the office to meet with someone new. Online networking is less enjoyable and more distracting. When I want to network with another person, I commute to the office.

I try to run my errands* on weekdays when stores aren't crowded. If this isn't possible for you, consider having groceries delivered during busy work periods.

I'm very [34] deliberate with when and how often I go to the office. Even if commuting is mandatory for you, think about whether you can minimize personal errands. Can you hire a babysitter to drive your children to their activities a couple times a month? Can you have your groceries delivered? Saving even an hour each week can reduce stress and improve happiness.

Sweden Close to Becoming 'Smoke-Free' Country

Sweden is getting close to becoming the first “smoke-free” country in the European Union (EU). The country of 10.5 million people has had the lowest percentage of smokers in the EU for many years.

A country is “smoke-free” if less than five percent of the population smokes daily. Only 6.4 percent of Swedes over the age of 15 were daily smokers in 2019. That was the lowest percentage in the EU. The Eurostat statistics agency says that across the 27 countries of the EU, the average was 18.5 percent.

Data from the Public Health Agency of Sweden show that the smoking rate has continued to fall, reaching 5.6 percent last year. “We like a healthy way to live, I think that’s the reason,” said Carina Astorsson, who lives in Stockholm. Smoking never interested her, she added, because “I don’t like the smell; I want to take care of my body.”

Sweden says its anti-smoking actions improve health in several ways, including a lower rate of lung cancer. Ulrika Arehed is secretary-general of the Swedish Cancer Society. She said Sweden was early to limit smoking in public places such as school playgrounds. Later, the country added smoking bans for outdoor restaurants and bus stations. The country also increased taxes on cigarettes and changed rules on how they can be sold.

However, other forms of tobacco remain popular in Sweden. Snus is a wet tobacco powder placed in the mouth next to the teeth. Snus makers say their products help reduce cigarette smoking. But health officials say snus is another product that makes people addicted* to nicotine, the main drug in tobacco.

“It is true that smoking is more harmful than most things you can do, including snus. But... there are many health risks even with snus,” said Arehed. Snus is such a popular part of Swedish culture that the country demanded an exemption* to the EU’s ban on smokeless tobacco when it joined the EU in 1995. Patrik Hildingsson is a spokesman for Swedish Match, Sweden’s top snus maker. He said officials should urge the tobacco industry to develop less harmful choices to smoking such as snus and e-cigarettes.

If snus and similar products are included, the World Health Organization (WHO) notes that more than 20 percent of adults in Sweden use tobacco. This brings Sweden close to the world average. “Switching from one harmful product to another is not a solution,” the WHO said in an email to The Associated Press.

Tove Marina Sohlberg is a researcher at Stockholm University’s Department of Public Health Sciences. She said Sweden’s anti-smoking rules have pushed smokers away from public spaces. “We are sending signals to the smokers that this is not accepted by society,” she said. The WHO marked “World No Tobacco Day” on Wednesday.
